MR. HAWTHORNE'S RELATED STORY.
FORTUNE'S FOOL. By JULIAN HAWTHORNE. 12mo.
pp. 470. James R. Osgood & Co.

Mr. Hawthorne's story is something of a disappointment, and yet it has qualities which the critic must note with satisfaction. It shows growth. It is clearly superior to his last novel, "Bart," in imaginative power and originality, and it conveys the impression that the author is rapidly taking his own measure. Self-knowledge is giving him assurance. He strikes out boldly in a rather hazardous path, and his movement is direct and vigorous. There is no doubt that he has carefully studied his father's methods, and there are scenes in "Fortune's Fool" which certainly never could have been written except under the influence of the elder novelist. Not to tire the reader with citations, let me take only one conspicuous instance; we mean the meeting between Lord Castlemere and M. Malgré, when the Frenchman, after pursuing his wrath in solitude for fourteen years, finds himself too old for vengeance:

"Body of God!" cried the old Frenchman, rising trembling from his chair, his features twisted with passion, and all the sarcasm of a long life mounting his enemy under a species of rage or politeness forgotten in his resentment: "do you know, wretch, who I am to whom you offer money for the story of a dead woman's shame?"

Having got as far as this, he paused to gather his energies to utter, with a smile, a burst of exuberance and dramatic effect, the sentence of revelation. But it old man had misinterpreted his strength. His physical forces were no longer adequate, as they once had been, to the expression of his rage; nay, even the rage itself, now that it was summoned to emerge from the imaginary realm in which it had been nourished for many years, and to find itself in a world where its master had little clearness. The officials do not give entertainment social gaieties are in fact few and far between. All the movement of life in the heart of the earth is slow and dull; but in the progress of railway building and the incision of a continent a new activity is beginning.
